The novel opens in the late 19th century, as a young woman named Annelise leaves her home in Germany to join her husband in the Wyoming Territory. Annelise is a strong and independent woman, but she is ill-prepared for the harsh realities of frontier life. Her husband, John, is a hard-working rancher, but he is also a gambler and a drinker. Annelise and

John's marriage is a difficult one, but they are bound together by their love for their children.

Annelise and John's children are as different as night and day. Their eldest son, William, is a quiet and thoughtful boy who loves to read and write. Their daughter, Gretchen, is a fiery and independent spirit who is determined to make her own way in the world. The youngest child, Jacob, is a kind and gentle boy who is loved by everyone who meets him.

As the years pass, Annelise and John's marriage continues to deteriorate. John becomes increasingly abusive, and Annelise is forced to flee with her children. They settle in a small town, where Annelise opens a boarding house. Annelise's boarding house becomes a haven for travelers, and she is known for her kindness and compassion.

William grows up to be a successful writer, and Gretchen becomes a nurse. Jacob, however, is killed in a tragic accident. Annelise is heartbroken by her son's death, but she finds solace in her faith and in the love of her children and grandchildren.
