Leaving and Living: Migrations in South Asia is a groundbreaking book that examines the complex and multifaceted nature of migration in South Asia. Through a series of in-depth case studies, the book explores the causes and consequences of migration, as well as the challenges and opportunities that migrants face.

The book is divided into four parts. The first part, "Leaving," examines the factors that drive people to leave their homes in South Asia. These factors include poverty, unemployment, political instability, and environmental disasters.

The second part of the book, "Living," explores the experiences of migrants in their new countries. The book examines the challenges that migrants face, such as discrimination, racism, and xenophobia. It also examines the opportunities that migrants find, such as education, employment, and social mobility.

The third part of the book, "Displacement," examines the issue of forced migration in South Asia. The book explores the causes of displacement, such as war, persecution, and natural disasters. It also examines the challenges that displaced people face, such as lack of access to food, shelter, and healthcare.

The fourth part of the book, "Remittances and Diaspora," examines the impact of migration on the economies and societies of South Asia. The book explores the role of remittances in supporting development in South Asia. It also examines the role of the South Asian diaspora in promoting cultural exchange and understanding.

Leaving and Living: Migrations in South Asia is a timely and important book that provides a comprehensive overview of the complex and multifaceted nature of migration in the region. The book is essential reading for anyone who is interested in migration, South Asia, or global affairs.
