

Public Entrepreneurs: Agents for Change in American Government

In a time of government gridlock and political polarization, Public Entrepreneurs offers a hopeful and practical new model for change, one that can be implemented by citizens at any level of government or organization. The book profiles 15 public entrepreneurs who are using innovative approaches to solve some of our most pressing problems, from education and healthcare to economic development and environmental protection. These entrepreneurs are not waiting for permission or handouts; they are taking the initiative to make a difference in their communities and the world.

Public entrepreneurs are change agents who work within the public sector to improve the lives of citizens. They are creative, resourceful, and persistent. They are not afraid to take risks or to challenge the status quo. And they are driven by a deep belief that government can be a force for good in the world.

The 15 public entrepreneurs profiled in this book come from a variety of backgrounds and experiences. They work in all levels of government, from local to federal. They come from both the public and private sectors. And they have all achieved remarkable success in their efforts to improve the lives of citizens.

One of the most inspiring stories in the book is that of Geoffrey Canada. Canada is the founder of the Harlem Children's Zone, a non-profit organization that provides a range of services to low-income families in Harlem, New York City. Canada's goal is to help these children break the cycle of poverty and achieve their full potential. And he is succeeding. The Harlem Children's Zone has been credited with reducing crime, improving educational outcomes, and increasing economic opportunities in Harlem.

Another inspiring story is that of Beth Simone Noveck. Noveck is a former White House official who is now the founder of the Public Policy Lab. The Public Policy Lab is a non-profit organization that helps government agencies use technology to improve their performance. Noveck's goal is to make government more efficient, effective, and responsive to the needs of citizens. And she is succeeding. The Public Policy Lab has helped government agencies save money, improve service delivery, and increase transparency.

The stories of Geoffrey Canada and Beth Simone Noveck are just two examples of the many ways that public entrepreneurs are making a difference in the world. These entrepreneurs are proving that government can be a force for good. And they are inspiring us all to get involved and make a difference in our communities.

How to Be a Public Entrepreneur

If you are interested in becoming a public entrepreneur, there are a few things you can do:

- Identify a problem that you are passionate about solving. This could be anything from improving education to reducing poverty to protecting the environment.
- Do your research. Learn as much as you can about the problem you want to solve. This will help you develop a plan of action.
- Find allies. You can't do it alone. Find other people who share your passion and who are willing to help you make a difference.
- Take action. Don't wait for permission. Start small and build momentum. The more you do, the more people will join you.

Being a public entrepreneur is not easy. It takes hard work, dedication, and perseverance. But it is also one of the most rewarding things you can do. If you have a passion for making a difference in the world, then I encourage you to become a public entrepreneur.

Public entrepreneurs are change agents who are working to improve the lives of citizens. They are creative, resourceful, and persistent. They are not afraid to take risks or to challenge the status quo. And they are driven by a deep belief that government can be a force for good in the world.

The stories of the 15 public entrepreneurs profiled in this book are inspiring. They show us that anything is possible if we have the courage to dream big and to work hard to make our dreams a reality.
