Hedgehog Diet

Hedgehogs are omnivores, which means they eat both plants and animals. In the wild, they typically eat insects, worms, slugs, snails, and other small invertebrates. They will also eat fruits, vegetables, and eggs.

When choosing a diet for your hedgehog, it is important to select a food that is specifically designed for hedgehogs. These foods are typically high in protein and fat, and they contain all the nutrients that hedgehogs need. You can also supplement your hedgehog's diet with fresh fruits and vegetables.

It is important to avoid feeding your hedgehog foods that are high in sugar or fat. These foods can lead to obesity and other health problems.

Hedgehog Habitat

Hedgehogs need a safe and comfortable place to live. Their enclosure should be at least 2 feet by 4 feet, and it should be well-ventilated. The enclosure should also include a hiding place, a sleeping area, and a litter box.

The temperature in the enclosure should be between 70 and 80 degrees Fahrenheit. Hedgehogs are sensitive to cold, so it is important to make sure that the enclosure is warm enough.

The substrate in the enclosure should be soft and absorbent. You can use a variety of substrates, such as shredded paper, fleece, or aspen shavings.

Hedgehog Breeding

Hedgehogs can breed year-round, but they are most likely to breed in the spring and summer. The gestation period for hedgehogs is about 35 days, and the average litter size is 4-6 hedgehogs.

Hedgehogs are born blind and deaf, and they are completely dependent on their mother for care. The mother hedgehog will nurse her young for about 6 weeks, and she will then wean them onto solid food.

Hedgehogs reach sexual maturity at about 4-6 months of age. They can live for up to 5 years in captivity.

Hedgehog Behavior

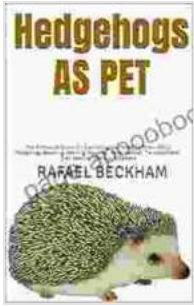

Hedgehogs are solitary animals, and they are not typically aggressive towards other hedgehogs. However, they can be territorial, so it is important to provide them with enough space.

Hedgehogs are nocturnal animals, and they are most active at night. They spend the day sleeping in their hiding place.

Hedgehogs are very curious animals, and they love to explore their surroundings. They are also very good climbers, and they can often be found perching on high objects.
