

Time to Stir, Columbia '68: A Graphic History of Student Protest

In the spring of 1968, Columbia University was a hotbed of student activism. The Vietnam War was raging, and the university was deeply involved in military research. Students were also protesting against the university's racist and sexist policies.

On April 23, 1968, a group of students seized five buildings on campus, including the president's office. They held the buildings for several days, demanding that the university divest from war-related research and admit more minority students.

The protests at Columbia were part of a wave of student activism that swept across the United States in the 1960s. Students were demanding a voice in the decisions that were being made about their futures. They were also fighting for social justice and an end to the war.
